As guitar DI signals are highly dynamic, set your recording input level so that even your most animated thrashing does not clip. Boost pedals may be great at saturating a valve amp input stage but they will crunch your interface buffer in an unholy manner, so proceed with caution. Guitar modelling plugins/apps expect a large dynamic range and a relatively low input level so try to keep your input peak level below -10dBFS.

The preamp is responsible for taking the relatively puny signal from an electric guitar, adding muscle to it, and determining both how clean, crunchy, or highly overdriven it is and its basic tonality — read: Bass, Middle, and Treble. In effect, it can be likened to a basic body-shaping gym that zones in on certain areas and adds muscle and/or bulk — but nowhere near enough strength for the signal to be able to move a speaker or set of speakers.
